Spanish authorities reported the recovery of a deceased officer - identified via documents as Major William Martin, Royal Marines - found adrift near the Huelva coastline earlier this week. According to local intermediaries, the officer was carrying a locked briefcase containing several classified documents. Spanish officials unofficially indicated that ``the case has been examined only superficially'', although their phrasing suggests potential access by third parties.

The recovered documents reportedly outline Allied intentions to conduct imminent operations in the eastern Mediterranean, specifically referencing Greece and the Dodecanese as likely invasion objectives. One memorandum, attributed to senior British command, stresses the urgency of reinforcing these sectors due to ``German vulnerabilities in the Aegean island chain''.

A Spanish liaison, normally cooperative, provided inconsistent statements regarding the chain of custody, at one point noting that ``German observers showed interest'', though he later retracted this. Several local sources also described enhanced German diplomatic activity in Huelva in the past 48 hours, including quiet inquiries regarding British naval losses.

Notably, no corresponding alerts or deployment changes have been logged within British naval command for the Mediterranean theatre during this period. Furthermore, a routine Admiralty communication, received after the reported recovery, made no mention of any missing courier or personnel operating near the Iberian coastline.

Analysts assess that the documents - if genuine - describe operational plans inconsistent with current Allied posture. If compromised, they may influence German allocation of defensive resources in the Mediterranean region. Further evaluation is underway to determine the authenticity of the officer's identity and origin of the materials.
